

National Severe Weather Warning Service

Chief Forecasters Assessment

Further snow showers could continue to feed in from the North Sea on a cold easterly wind. Due to the nature of showers, some places are expected to receive an additional 2-5 cm of snow, whereas other places nearby might receive little or no snow. Some more persistent areas of snow may move north at times, perhaps giving a further 5-10 cm in places, but could turn to rain and sleet on coasts, with any more significant accumulations occurring inland and on high ground. The main risk of snow should become confined to the north by Monday.

This warning has been updated to extend it further south across Scotland as well as to include Shetland.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Snow and Ice

Valid from 00:05 on Sun, 04th Mar 2018 until 23:55 on Mon, 05th Mar 2018

Snow showers are expected to continue over parts of Scotland, bringing further accumulations of snow in places as well as icy stretches on untreated surfaces. In addition, some areas more persistent snow may move north at times. Further delays to travel and public transport could occur. Further impacts to power supplies/mobile phone coverage are also possible.
